

Swell day to learn to surf
Visually impaired students learn confidence, make memories

ANNE GEGGIS - STAFF WRITER

May 16, 2010; Page 01B

PONCE INLET -- PONCE INLET - She knew it was a sunny day - she could feel the sun on her face. And the sound of the waves told her she was at the beach, as planned.

But what 15-year-old Heidi Springstroh really couldn't fathom Saturday was gliding over water on a board.

"I've always been scared to try," she said. "I was scared today."

The Indialantic high-schooler has more than the usual reason to shrink from the challenge of barreling into the waves - she can't tell how far away things are.

She is legally blind, as are the 36 other teenagers who joined her at Winterhaven Park. But before Saturday morning was over, she was absolutely amped about what she had done.

"My second try, I was able to stand," she said. "I couldn't believe it."

And, then, came the feeling of being pushed along the contours of the waves.

"It was exhilarating. It was just amazing," Heidi said. "I was amazed that I could actually do it. I never thought I could stand up."

The 14- to 22-year-olds come to the Center for the Visually Impaired in Daytona Beach after school and on weekends to learn how to cope with being legally blind.

This time, though, their life coaches asked them to think of something they had never done but wanted to pursue.

And that's how collectively they came up with the idea of surfing. About 20 students from a similar agency in Jacksonville were also invited.

"What we're trying to do here is get the students to take risks and take on these challenges," explained Dan Pekich, program manager for the Center for the Visually Impaired.

"Once you give them a little bit of confidence, it can spread to their future employment goals, their social lives."

Their guides to winging across the water came from the Surfari Surf School in Ormond Beach. Rick Gehris, owner of the shop, said he was pleased with how everyone did. Ten instructors joined him to give the aspiring surfers a 30-minute ground lesson. Then, they took to the waves, with one instructor leading each surfer.

Gehris paddled behind one girl who can't stand on land without the help of a walker as she lay on the board and sliced through the waves. Cecilia Rodriguez, who is 100 percent blind, came off that board declaring, "This is officially one of my memories."

Chris Patterson, an instructor who works in the communications department at Halifax Health when he's not surfing, said he'll never forget the smiles he saw.

"It was amazing to see these kids," he said. "No fear."

Dominic Perez, 17, of Deltona ended the day content to bodyboard. Being carried by the waves and listening to the excitement of his fellow students made it more than just a regular day at the beach for the student at the Florida School for the Deaf and Blind in St. Augustine.

"It was exciting," said the teen, who has been legally blind since an injury when he was 3 years old.

Cutline: Photo 1: Orlando resident Kevin Brathwaite, 17, who is visually impaired, gets into position on his surfboard along with other kids while they listen to surf instructions Saturday.

Photo 2: Dominic Moralez, 17, of DeLand stands briefly while riding a wave on his surfboard as surf coach Jessica Bickmeyer cheers him on.

Photo 3: Surfing coach Chris Patterson, in the red shirt, shows Dominic Moralez, 17, of DeLand, who is visually impaired, the finer points of body position before heading out into the surf to catch waves Saturday.

Photo 4: Surf instructor Ricky Gehris teaches visually impaired kids the basics of surfing Saturday morning. After practicing on dry land, the surfers, each with a coach in tow, hit the water to try their luck.

News-Journal/ JIM TILLER